Helping Children Control Their Anger! Part 2

Parents can help their children find a ways to release the anger. For example: "Wow, I can tell you are getting really frustrated with your homework. I see that you are clenching your fists and breathing faster. Maybe it would help you to take a short break and then come back to try again." By talking to your child in this way you are naming their feeling (frustration), noticing how they are acting (breathing fast and clenching fists), and giving them a way to stay in control (take a short break to relax).
